Research Background:

The Philippines is the third most disaster-prone country in the world with high risk from natural disasters. If natural disasters create tremendous negative impacts on both economic activities and people's livelihood, and with the recurring and increasing magnitude of these events, how should we be prepared for them?

It is the interest of this research to identify the conditions how local governments in the Philippines have tackled the challenges of performing their devolved mandates of local economic development (LED) and disaster risk reduction (DRR) after being hit by Typhoon Haiyan in 2013 in the lens of LED as transformational politics.
